

REPRESENTATION IN ARTS EDUCATION MATTERS

2025

THE VISION

Since the MAEIA performance assessments were developed by the Michigan Assessment Consortium in the early 2010s, our society has experienced a socio-cultural re-examination, with identity taking a more featured role when it comes to classroom culture and community building, curriculum and instruction, and assessment practices.

In a MAEIA blog series on culturally responsive teaching, as well as the MAEIA Academy course series titled Embodied Practices: Social-Emotional Learning and Culturally Responsive Teaching in and through the Arts, MAEIA Consultant Nafeesah Symonette describes the importance of “windows and mirrors” within the arts curriculum. This concept supports students in seeing artists who look like them as well as engaging with artists whose lives and identities are different from theirs. The goal is to create a better sense of self within the context of a global society, while bolstering empathy through artistic practice.

In support of this vision, we've have compiled this “live document” of artists who represent a range of eras, identities, and backgrounds for consideration in your teaching. We are not promoting these artists but rather providing a pool of perspectives and works of art for you, the educator, to vet and discern whether the work of these artists helps you develop a well-rounded curriculum of artists who represent the “windows and mirrors” or your students.

Before introducing these artists to your students, review their work, biographical information, and context for their lives and art. The intention is to build social awareness through appropriate exemplars of professional artists. It is the responsibility of every educator to adhere to copyright laws when considering to share or reproduce an artists' work. Be sure to check each artist's website for usage policy and restrictions before using any works referenced here.

In the list below of artists in dance, music, theatre, and visual arts, some entries include a link to a MAEIA performance assessment. In these instances, the work cited may be considered as an additional prompt for the identified MAEIA assessment item.

To suggest an artist for this list, please use the Contact Us form on the MAEIA website at: <https://maeia-artsednetwork.org/contact-us/> to provide your recommended artists' names, genres, websites, and notable works.
